

Lee Corso

Lee Corso may be best known for his work on ESPN's College GameDay program.

Corso was born in Orlando, Florida and attended Florida State University on a football and baseball scholarship where he roomed with future Hollywood star Burt Reynolds. Corso's speed on the field earned him the nickname Sunshine Scooter.

Upon graduating with a degree in physical education, Corso became the quarterbacks coach at the University of Maryland under his former FSU coach Tommy Nugent. In 1969, he was given the head coaching position at the University of Louisville. After taking Louisville to their first-ever bowl game in 1972, he was hired by Indiana University.

After ten years at Indiana, Corso became an announcer for the United States Football League (USFL). After a brief stint as head coach at the University of Northern Illinois, Corso returned to the USFL - as a coach for the Orlando Renegades.

In 1987 Lee was hired by ESPN as an analyst for the College GameDay program. He currently sits alongside Chris Fowler and Kirk Herbstreit, covering most of the major college football games from August until January.
